JEFF NORMAN, L'02

Joining Forces

As a kid playing in his Milwaukee neighborhood, Jeffrey Norman recalled, “We played cops and robbers. I always wanted to be the cop.”

That’s easy to believe as you look at him on the other side of a table in the basement cafeteria of the Milwaukee County Courthouse. Norman is wearing the uniform of a Milwaukee Police Department captain. He joined the department as a patrol officer in 1996 and has risen to detective to lieutenant to captain. He previously served as a criminal investigator and patrol commander; his current duties put him in an administrative role, not out on the street.

Norman graduated in 1992 from Milwaukee’s North Division High School and from the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, where he majored in criminal justice, in 1996. The police department was his next stop.

Soon, he was working as a patrol officer on the south side of Milwaukee, which is largely white and Hispanic. “That opened my eyes to a bigger Milwaukee,” said Norman, who grew up in predominantly African-American neighborhoods on the north side.

“A crossroads moment,” as he called it, when another officer did not follow proper procedure involving a prisoner, led Norman to act on his longtime interest in becoming a lawyer. He enrolled in Marquette Law School as a part-time student, continuing to work as an officer full time. He completed law school in four and a half years.

A law firm or a job in a corporate office didn’t appeal to Norman. But the Milwaukee County district attorney’s office did. He became a prosecutor and speaks highly of the experience. But after a year, he decided that he could serve the community better as a law enforcement officer and returned to the police department. He’s been there since.

Has his law degree been useful? “Absolutely,” Norman said. On duty, in particular, he said, it has made him a better supervisor and a better police officer more generally, partly because he understands legal aspects of many of the issues police face—probable cause, searches, even how to write up reports effectively.

“Balance.” Norman said the word with emphasis as he talked about what he likes to do on his own time. Police officers see a lot of bad things. He tries to offset that when he’s off duty. “You have to be proactive in seeing the world as positive.” He engages in volunteer work, including Marquette Law School alumni activities such as service on the diversity committee in recruiting students.

And beyond that? “I love a good cigar. . . . I like good company and good conversation.” This interview was held after he returned from a trip on his Harley to Cincinnati for a jazz festival. Norman’s wife, Sharniecia, is a doctor. They have two children, a son, Kyle, 11, and a daughter, Sydney, 8.

Norman does practice law on a limited basis, mostly matters for clients he knows personally. Now 43, he will be eligible in several years to retire from the police department. Then? He’s not sure. But expect him to stay involved in broader issues in some fashion. He said, “I strive to do things that contribute to the community.” ■

JULIE FLESSAS, L'88

Once a Nurse, Always a Nurse—but Also a Lawyer

Julie Flessas dreamed of following in the footsteps of her favorite aunts by becoming a nurse. And she did, working as a registered nurse in nursing homes and, later, in intensive care units. “Working with the sickest of the sick demanded an enhanced knowledge of nursing practice,” she said. “I loved working in critical care. It demanded a type of thinking that went beyond any single moment. One witnesses human resiliency, as well as unimaginable pain, suffering, disability, and death.” Her observations would eventually be of great use in a career in personal injury litigation.

“Of course, there are also times when, for many reasons, one witnesses patient care that is not optimal,” Flessas said. On one occasion, she spoke to a superior about an incident she had seen and was rebuked. Go to law school if you want to be lawyer, she was told.

After hearing about lawyers who were looking for help in reviewing cases involving medical matters, Flessas began her transition to legal work. One law firm offered her a part-time job, which supplemented her nursing income. “My background fit perfectly with reviewing medical records and helping with personal injury trial prep,” she recalled.

She was encouraged by Gerald Turner, one of the lawyers she helped, to enroll in law school, with the goal of working with him full time upon graduation. That second prod to go to law school was effective, and she then joined Turner’s law firm.

The energetic commitment that she brought to critical-care nursing transferred perfectly to the courtroom. “Litigation takes a lot of time, preparation, and a very thick skin,” Flessas said. “When I started, it was predominantly a male world. It was interesting.” She meant that as an understatement.

Within a year of becoming a lawyer, she was contacted to serve as co-counsel in a case where a faulty connector allowed transposition of an oxygen and carbon dioxide hose during surgery, a hazard she had been trained to avoid. The family received the largest wrongful death settlement in Ohio for a single male.

In 2003, she expanded her practice, representing more than 225 people who had used a then-popular diet drug known as fen-phen and later struggled with varying degrees of heart-valve damage that research would eventually find to be a side effect of the drug. Nationwide, the drug manufacturer ultimately paid billions of dollars in damages. “Those were busy years for me as a wife, mom, nurse, and lawyer,” said Flessas.

With retirements and a revamping of the firm, Flessas Law Firm emerged. The firm represents clients injured from accidents, malpractice, pharmaceuticals, and medical products. Flessas said she has learned the ABCs of running a firm: Acumen in law. Business sense. Courage.

Flessas has a strong sense of justice and helping others. She works with abused women and high-risk youth. She has retained her nursing license, both because it is valuable in her legal work and because she continues to help several elderly individuals in need of nursing care and medication guidance.

Flessas is grateful for the opportunities her law degree has afforded her. She emphasizes the profusion of knowledge a law degree provides. She said that merging nursing and law helped her find her place. She saw that the passion she had caring for others in nursing was easily transferable to law. She said, “It is and has been a very interesting and rewarding journey.” ■

Alumna of the Year Award
Maxine A. White, L'85

Lifetime Achievement Award
Thomas M. Olejniczak, L'74

Howard B. Eisenberg Service Award
Katherine McChrystal, L'10

Charles W. Mentkowski Sports Law Alumna of the Year Award
Susan K. Allen, L'06

President Michael R. Lovell

Only a flavor of the citations accompanying the awards can be conveyed here. White has served on the Milwaukee County Circuit Court for 25 years and currently is chief judge. Her commitment and breadth of service to the legal profession and the larger community are prodigious. Olejniczak is a partner in Conway, Olejniczak & Jerry and a sought-out lawyer in Green Bay; his nominators emphasized his "tireless integrity, advocacy, and energy" to "so many of this region's charitable and civic organizations." McChrystal, with Gagne McChrystal De Lorenzo and Burghardt, has used her family-law expertise in the development of the Milwaukee Justice Center and served the AIDS Resource Center of Wisconsin in numerous capacities. And Allen's involvement in Marquette's National Sports Law Institute began even when she was an undergraduate and has continued since law school graduation in numerous ways, with service as an alumna coach of Marquette's sports-law moot court teams being simply an example.

On Thursday, April 26, 2018, the Law School will present this academic year's alumni awards. The ceremony celebrates the mission of Marquette University—Excellence, Faith, Leadership, and Service—and the general ideal of the Marquette lawyer. It is a premier and important event. We hope that you will join us at it.
